In certain team settings or youth leagues, the 15-out dribble-drive strategy can be an effective option. This approach combines well with the 4-out 1-in method or can be used as a standalone system. For instance, in situational 5-out play, player 5 secures a defensive rebound and then trails behind an outlet pass to player 1. The offense transitions into a two-side fast break with players 3 and 4 on the perimeter. In this scenario, player 5 does not attempt to rim-run. Player 1 possesses regular options with player 2, such as drop zone kickups or backcuts, which can lead to attacks on the middle of the court for pitch opportunities or swing passes to player 5, creating a corner cut and double gap. The ultimate goal is to create gaps that allow for dribble penetration, resulting in inside finishes or kick-out three-pointers. Spacing and cutting are crucial in creating these gaps. Conventional 5-out spacing typically involves single gaps, requiring players to make cuts to generate bigger openings, particularly through corner cuts. Other players maintain their spacing to preserve the gap and reposition upon an attack.
